Renato Canova \u2013 Marathon Training (Mileage) Traditionally, it has been thought that a marathoner must always run prodigiously high volumes\u2014upwards of 20 miles a day for the top athletes. In contrast, James Kwambi and Duncan Kibet only run 80-90 miles a week, often only running once per day. However, other elite marathoners like Martin Lel and Robert Cheruiyot maintain 135-150 miles per week.

\u201cTraining is not the work you do but the effect it has on your body\u201c The premise of Renato\u2019s training is to extend an athlete\u2019s ability to last a given pace, otherwise put, extend the length of time an athlete can run at the specific goal race pace until you reach the full race distance. Thus every event is matter of extension.

So, when Renato says "90% of 5:00 pace," he means "10% slower than 5:00 pace." To compute this, you do the following: 5:00/100*10 + 5:00 = 5:30 pace Here are two simple formulas that will aid you in calculating "Renato Canova percents": To calculate the resultant pace N by going P percent of race race (RP) N = RP*(2-P/100)

Canova recommends the following for total interval workout volume for each group: 10,000m runners: 10-12km Half-marathon: 12-15km Marathon: 20-30km Marathon and half-marathon runners also do a fast-paced long run as part of their special training (and will continue to do so into the specific period).

Something New in Training - Running Science

So you can also do interval workouts at these speeds (69-72 per 400m), using longer distances and shorter recoveries. Canova also mentions 800m runners doing 20-40min continuous runs at 1.4-1.5x race pace (3:30-3:45/km for you). Each of the endurance workouts supports your ability to run the next "level" up of speed.
