The Nose, a short story by Nikolai Gogol

Nikolai Gogol (1809-1852), writer of strange tales of Saint Petersburg, and himself a bearer of a fantastic nose! "The Nose" does have a strange premise. The completely surreal idea of losing one's nose reminds me a little bit of the sort of modern art that we foolishly claim our children could have painted.

Social status is one of the most important themes in Gogol's " The Nose." At the time of writing, Russian bureaucracy was a vastly inflated system for Russians to move up the ranks to nobility through service to the government. As such, positions within the bureaucracy were highly coveted and depended greatly on status.

In "The Nose," readers follow Collegiate Assessor Kovalev as he wakes up one day without a nose and later stumbles upon his missing organ sauntering around town like a well-to-do gentleman. This strange tale predates magical realism but fits right in with the genre—as is typical of other works of magical realism, magic occurs in this story within a realistic setting, among real-seeming people, and without any discernable reason, making it all the more jarring...

The Nose Introduction. Sure, he ended his life burning parts of his most famous work and generally acting loony, but hey, for a while there Gogol—or Nikolai Vailievich Gogol, if you're feeling fancy—was on quite the roll. In 1835, he was still a reasonably fresh face in Russia (he was about 27), but dude had already hit it out of the park with The Government Inspector —a hilarious, satirical play making fun of provincial bureaucrats.
